Forced & Child Labour; Signature Programme

What we want to achieve
Forced and child labour are eradicated from the fashion supply chain

---

The results
- Survivors are rehabilitated and attain viable livelihoods
- Improved policy environment that advances women’s rights and labour rights
- Communities are strengthened and can prevent forced and child labour
- Increased awareness and knowledge for accountability
- Improved brand and supplier practices deter forced and child labour

How we measure success
- Number of female and male survivors trained and employed with viable livelihoods
- Number of survivors and at-risk children enrolled in school
- Documentation of policy improvements related to forced and child labour
- Community structures in place to prevent forced and child labour

---

Potential risks
- Socio-cultural factors that feed forced and child labour cannot be changed
- Lack of transparency prevents effective efforts to reduce forced and child labour
- Corruption and lack of political support will weaken policy implementation
- Government suppression and weak civil society capacity inhibit effective demands for human rights
- Brands are unwilling to change long-standing buying and pricing practices

How we measure success
- Number of female and male workers participating in rights and empowerment programmes
- Number of brands collaborating in initiatives to improve the protection of workers
- Number and focus of media stories

---

We believe
- Viable alternative livelihoods will keep survivors free
- Collectively, brands have the power to influence suppliers of all tiers to improve worker protections
- Suppliers and brands want to remove forced and child labour from their supply chains
- Media is interested in reporting on forced and child labour
- Exposing forced and child labour to key people, including the public, will lead to behaviour change

What we do
- Improve policy enforcement and access to justice for survivors
- Improve supply chain transparency and traceability to make people accountable
- Support holistic programming, including education and women’s empowerment, in hotspot areas to prevent child and forced labour
- Strengthen organisations and develop data, tools, and spaces for learning and collaboration

---

The challenge
- Forced labour and child labour are rife in the fashion supply chain
- Suppliers take advantage of weak law enforcement and poor socio-cultural and economic conditions to exploit workers
- Women are disproportionately impacted by forced labour because of their second-class status in society
- Women’s vulnerability increases the risk of their children becoming involved in child labour

---

The results
- Survivors are rehabilitated and attain viable livelihoods
- Improved policy environment that advances women’s rights and labour rights
- Communities are strengthened and can prevent forced and child labour
- Increased awareness and knowledge for accountability
- Improved brand and supplier practices deter forced and child labour

How we measure success
- Number of female and male workers participating in rights and empowerment programmes
- Number of brands collaborating in initiatives to improve the protection of workers
- Number and focus of media stories

---

Potential risks
- Socio-cultural factors that feed forced and child labour cannot be changed
- Lack of transparency prevents effective efforts to reduce forced and child labour
- Corruption and lack of political support will weaken policy implementation
- Government suppression and weak civil society capacity inhibit effective demands for human rights
- Brands are unwilling to change long-standing buying and pricing practices

How we measure success
- Number of female and male survivors trained and employed with viable livelihoods
- Number of survivors and at-risk children enrolled in school
- Documentation of policy improvements related to forced and child labour
- Community structures in place to prevent forced and child labour

---

We believe
- Viable alternative livelihoods will keep survivors free
- Collectively, brands have the power to influence suppliers of all tiers to improve worker protections
- Suppliers and brands want to remove forced and child labour from their supply chains
- Media is interested in reporting on forced and child labour
- Exposing forced and child labour to key people, including the public, will lead to behaviour change

What we do
- Improve policy enforcement and access to justice for survivors
- Improve supply chain transparency and traceability to make people accountable
- Support holistic programming, including education and women’s empowerment, in hotspot areas to prevent child and forced labour
- Strengthen organisations and develop data, tools, and spaces for learning and collaboration

---

The challenge
- Forced labour and child labour are rife in the fashion supply chain
- Suppliers take advantage of weak law enforcement and poor socio-cultural and economic conditions to exploit workers
- Women are disproportionately impacted by forced labour because of their second-class status in society
- Women’s vulnerability increases the risk of their children becoming involved in child labour

---

The results
- Survivors are rehabilitated and attain viable livelihoods
- Improved policy environment that advances women’s rights and labour rights
- Communities are strengthened and can prevent forced and child labour
- Increased awareness and knowledge for accountability
- Improved brand and supplier practices deter forced and child labour

How we measure success
- Number of female and male workers participating in rights and empowerment programmes
- Number of brands collaborating in initiatives to improve the protection of workers
- Number and focus of media stories

---

Potential risks
- Socio-cultural factors that feed forced and child labour cannot be changed
- Lack of transparency prevents effective efforts to reduce forced and child labour
- Corruption and lack of political support will weaken policy implementation
- Government suppression and weak civil society capacity inhibit effective demands for human rights
- Brands are unwilling to change long-standing buying and pricing practices

How we measure success
- Number of female and male survivors trained and employed with viable livelihoods
- Number of survivors and at-risk children enrolled in school
- Documentation of policy improvements related to forced and child labour
- Community structures in place to prevent forced and child labour

---

We believe
- Viable alternative livelihoods will keep survivors free
- Collectively, brands have the power to influence suppliers of all tiers to improve worker protections
- Suppliers and brands want to remove forced and child labour from their supply chains
- Media is interested in reporting on forced and child labour
- Exposing forced and child labour to key people, including the public, will lead to behaviour change

What we do
- Improve policy enforcement and access to justice for survivors
- Improve supply chain transparency and traceability to make people accountable
- Support holistic programming, including education and women’s empowerment, in hotspot areas to prevent child and forced labour
- Strengthen organisations and develop data, tools, and spaces for learning and collaboration

---

The challenge
- Forced labour and child labour are rife in the fashion supply chain
- Suppliers take advantage of weak law enforcement and poor socio-cultural and economic conditions to exploit workers
- Women are disproportionately impacted by forced labour because of their second-class status in society
- Women’s vulnerability increases the risk of their children becoming involved in child labour

---

The results
- Survivors are rehabilitated and attain viable livelihoods
- Improved policy environment that advances women’s rights and labour rights
- Communities are strengthened and can prevent forced and child labour
- Increased awareness and knowledge for accountability
- Improved brand and supplier practices deter forced and child labour

How we measure success
- Number of female and male workers participating in rights and empowerment programmes
- Number of brands collaborating in initiatives to improve the protection of workers
- Number and focus of media stories

---

Potential risks
- Socio-cultural factors that feed forced and child labour cannot be changed
- Lack of transparency prevents effective efforts to reduce forced and child labour
- Corruption and lack of political support will weaken policy implementation
- Government suppression and weak civil society capacity inhibit effective demands for human rights
- Brands are unwilling to change long-standing buying and pricing practices

How we measure success
- Number of female and male survivors trained and employed with viable livelihoods
- Number of survivors and at-risk children enrolled in school
- Documentation of policy improvements related to forced and child labour
- Community structures in place to prevent forced and child labour

---

We believe
- Viable alternative livelihoods will keep survivors free
- Collectively, brands have the power to influence suppliers of all tiers to improve worker protections
- Suppliers and brands want to remove forced and child labour from their supply chains
- Media is interested in reporting on forced and child labour
- Exposing forced and child labour to key people, including the public, will lead to behaviour change

What we do
- Improve policy enforcement and access to justice for survivors
- Improve supply chain transparency and traceability to make people accountable
- Support holistic programming, including education and women’s empowerment, in hotspot areas to prevent child and forced labour
- Strengthen organisations and develop data, tools, and spaces for learning and collaboration

---

The challenge
- Forced labour and child labour are rife in the fashion supply chain
- Suppliers take advantage of weak law enforcement and poor socio-cultural and economic conditions to exploit workers
- Women are disproportionately impacted by forced labour because of their second-class status in society
- Women’s vulnerability increases the risk of their children becoming involved in child labour

---

The results
- Survivors are rehabilitated and attain viable livelihoods
- Improved policy environment that advances women’s rights and labour rights
- Communities are strengthened and can prevent forced and child labour
- Increased awareness and knowledge for accountability
- Improved brand and supplier practices deter forced and child labour

How we measure success
- Number of female and male workers participating in rights and empowerment programmes
- Number of brands collaborating in initiatives to improve the protection of workers
- Number and focus of media stories

---

Potential risks
- Socio-cultural factors that feed forced and child labour cannot be changed
- Lack of transparency prevents effective efforts to reduce forced and child labour
- Corruption and lack of political support will weaken policy implementation
- Government suppression and weak civil society capacity inhibit effective demands for human rights
- Brands are unwilling to change long-standing buying and pricing practices

How we measure success
- Number of female and male survivors trained and employed with viable livelihoods
- Number of survivors and at-risk children enrolled in school
- Documentation of policy improvements related to forced and child labour
- Community structures in place to prevent forced and child labour

---

We believe
- Viable alternative livelihoods will keep survivors free
- Collectively, brands have the power to influence suppliers of all tiers to improve worker protections
- Suppliers and brands want to remove forced and child labour from their supply chains
- Media is interested in reporting on forced and child labour
- Exposing forced and child labour to key people, including the public, will lead to behaviour change

What we do
- Improve policy enforcement and access to justice for survivors
- Improve supply chain transparency and traceability to make people accountable
- Support holistic programming, including education and women’s empowerment, in hotspot areas to prevent child and forced labour
- Strengthen organisations and develop data, tools, and spaces for learning and collaboration

---

The challenge
- Forced labour and child labour are rife in the fashion supply chain
- Suppliers take advantage of weak law enforcement and poor socio-cultural and economic conditions to exploit workers
- Women are disproportionately impacted by forced labour because of their second-class status in society
- Women’s vulnerability increases the risk of their children becoming involved in child labour